Those links are as follows: The present invention generally relates to methods for manufacturing fuel cells and, more particularly, to methods for laminating (i.e., laminating and drying) a plurality of anode catalyst layers, a polymer electrolyte layer, and cathode catalyst layers. A typical prior art fuel cell system includes a fuel cell stack having a series of fuel cell plates, which include an anode electrode and a cathode electrode. Within the stack, each fuel cell plate includes a catalyst coated on its gas diffusion side, and each anode electrode and cathode electrode include a catalyst coated on its gas diffusion side. Such fuel cell plates typically have a flow field plate, an anode electrode and a cathode electrode. The flow field plates are arranged in alternating parallel and perpendicular relationship to each other. In more detail, the flow field plates are typically fabricated from graphite, and typically have the same thickness and size as the other layers of the plate (i.e., the anode catalyst layer, the polymer electrolyte layer, and the cathode catalyst layer, with each layer being about 0.2 mm thick). The flow field plate, however, is substantially larger than the other layers (i.e., the anode catalyst layer, the polymer electrolyte layer, and the cathode catalyst layer, with each layer being about 0.1 mm thick). In a typical process, the flow field plates are fabricated from graphite material, and are typically about 0.2 mm thick, and about 0.5 to about 0.8 mm in width and length. Furthermore, the process typically includes a masking step, in which the graphite material is masked so as to allow the graphite
